Lorber, after Sullivan voted to table a motion requiring the Attorney General to make the Epstein files public.

Billionaire financier Henry Kravis donated $8,500 to the Sullivan Victory Committee on April 1, 2026. Kravis appeared in Epstein’s “little black book,” of key social and business contacts that Epstein considered important enough to save. A Vanity Fair article from July, 2019 described Kravis’ black book appearance by writing, “How did Kravis, who is usually oh so careful about such things, get into Epstein’s book?” No allegation of wrongdoing has ever been made of Kravis in regards to the Epstein case.

Howard Lorber donated $693 to Alaskans for Dan Sullivan on June 28, 2026. Lorber was in the Epstein files through direct email references and was part of Epstein’s proposed “war council” of Trump associates in response to the Russia investigation.

Conversations documented in the Epstein files revealed that Epstein had floated the idea of a “war council” for Trump to handle messaging fallout from the Robert Mueller investigation into Russia collusion in the 2016 Presidential election.

In one email to an unidentified assistant, Epstein suggested a group of “heavy-hitter” allies that could make up the war council, and suggested Lorber: “I assume you are still close to Ivanka. If so, there are a few of his heavy-hitter friends that would like to help (me not included, of course). I think a war council. Schwartzman, Wynn, Rudy, Lorber, Lefrak, you, Barrack, should be called in to give suggestions.”

These exchanges came AFTER Epstein pleaded guilty in 2008 to one count of soliciting prostitution from someone under the age of 18, and was sentenced to 18 months in jail.

In 2025, prior to these donations, Sullivan voted to block the release of the Epstein files by voting to table a motion to direct the Attorney General to make publicly available
