ELIE V. U.S. / OCTOBER 30, 2026

Why Is the Media Ignoring the Stunning New Trump-Epstein Allegations?

In this week's Elie v. U.S., our justice correspondent asks why the media is obsessing over Obama's Cheesecake Factory joke while largely ignoring allegations of Trump's sexual assaults. Plus: Republicans prepare to cry election fraud.

The president of the United States of America has been accused of rape. Again. The president of the United States has been accused of rape in a report issued by the Democrats of the House Judiciary Committee, as part of their ongoing investigation of Donald Trump's ties to Jeffrey Epstein. The president has been accused of raping two women, one when she was as young as 13, and sexually assaulting three more. They are among 11 women who provided evidence or testimony that Trump "abused, assaulted, and even raped numerous women alongside, and in coordination with, the most infamous sex trafficker in history."

I have been made to understand that many people do not know about the Judiciary Comittee report—and the fact that five women have accused Trump of sexual assault while in or near the presence of noted pedophile Jeffrey Epstein. I have been made to understand that this is because the mainstream media finds former president Barack Obama's comments about the [checks notes] Cheesecake Factory more worthy of their attention than the current president's abuse of multiple women.

If asked, mainstream media types would no doubt argue that the lack of coverage of these latest rape allegations stems from the fact that previous rape allegations failed to "move the needle." Trump's sexual misconduct (both alleged and litigated) is "baked in" to people's understanding of the man. People either won't believe the charges or won't care—or else they do believe the women and do care and vote accordingly—but everybody knows what he's been accused of, generally speaking at least.
