Oct. 21 (UPI) -- Two of Jeffrey Epstein's closest advisers have been targeted in a civil lawsuit filed Wednesday in New Mexico, the site of the notorious pedophile's "Zorro Ranch."

The state of New Mexico and its attorney general, Raúl Torrez, filed suit in U.S. District Court against Darren Indyke and Richard Kahn, co-executors of Epstein's estate, whom they accused of facilitating and concealing his "sexual abuse and human trafficking."

The suit is meant to ensure that Indyke, Epstein's personal lawyer, and Kahn, his personal accountant, "do not profit after [Epstein's] death from the illegal activity that they enabled and furthered.

"Through this action, the state seeks to hold these individuals accountable to the fullest extent possible and to ensure that Epstein's assets are distributed to the survivors of his horrific crimes," the suit states.

Epstein updated his will two days before his death by suicide in 2019 to leave Indyke with $50 million and Kahn with $25 million.

The pair were earlier accused in a now-settled class action suit of helping Epstein conceal his sex trafficking operation by structuring bank accounts so that they could access large amounts of cash in furtherance of his crimes.

They have publicly denied any knowledge of the financier's sex crimes and admitted no wrongdoing in the class action settlement.

Torrez, speaking Wednesday at a press conference, said he filed the suit in wake of his office's investigation of property Epstein owned in the state known as Zorro Ranch. The probe was launched after the site was mentioned in the partial "Epstein files" release by the Trump administration.

"That criminal probe is ongoing and we continue to seek access to the complete unredacted Epstein files," he said. "Nevertheless, we are here today to mark an important milestone and the use of another legal tool at our disposal to hopefully shed light on individuals in Jeffrey Epstein's orbit who were participants in what we describe as an ongoing criminal enterprise that facilitated human trafficking and sexual abuse at Zorro Ranch and beyond.

"Frankly," Torrez added, "if anyone is entitled to a recovery of Jeffrey Epstein's estate, it's the survivors, who were targeted and trafficked here in New Mexico and beyond."

The state also sued the U.S. Justice Department in August seeking access to unredacted files related to the disgraced billionaire, accusing the Trump administration of refusing to share records that could help investigators corroborate evidence and identify witnesses at Zorro Ranch.

Epstein bought the property in 1993 and regularly used it over 25 years, building a 27,000-square-foot mansion and a private runway. His estate sold the property in 2023.
